Cruiser Tank Mark VIII A27L Centaur – Cobbaton Combat Collection (UK)

The Centaur MkIV tank in the Cobbaton Combat Collection was built in 1944. It is Serial Number 72 and the tank's vehicle registration number was T11243 which is still painted on the outside of the tank today. It was converted into a Centaur Dozer tank by the Army in July 1945. The conversion consisted in the turret removal and a metal blade was added to the front of the tank. It was sold as scrap in 1957 and remained at the Pound's Military Scrap Yard in Portsmouth until Preston Isaacs of Cobbaton Combat purchased the tank hull in 1979 (Craig Moore). It currently carries a mock up turret, but the museum owns an original turret which is intended to be fitted to the tank (<http://www.armouruk.net/>). Although it didn't run for a while, it is in running condition

Cruiser Tank Mark VIII A27L Centaur – The Bannister collection (UK)

It probably was a Centaur MK I or III and modified to a Centaur Dozer in 44 or 45. You can still see some of the dozer modifications on the tank (as of July, 2022). It was given a type A/B hull, it has 2 top opening hatches. It has the early Number 20 besa mount and housing for telescope number 35 (Lance Varga). Used in Band of Brothers serie

This tank was originally a Dozer (Steve Osfield), and was restored at Duxford by the Imperial War Museum with a Cavalier turret which was recovered on a fire range in the UK. Some of the fittings of Centaur Dozer tanks can still be seen on the hull. Marked and restored to appear as a Centaur close support tank of the Royal Marines Armoured Support Group, according to "Hermanville Centaur," Military Machines International, Vol. 6, No. 8 (January 2007). The Cavalier turret comes from a wreck of the Otterburn fire range, which carried the serial T129857U (<http://hmvf.co.uk/> forum)

About 24 tanks were sold to Portugal. The first Centaur tanks were delivered in 1945. There are still some doubts if Portugal only received Centaurs, or also few Cromwells. The tanks remained in active duty until 1955 (<http://www.areamilitar.net/>)

Cruiser Tank Mark VIII A30 Challenger wreck – Bovington Tank Museum (UK)

Formerly stored at the Isle of Wight Military Museum (UK). This tank is awaiting restoration, it will be displayed at Bovington once restored. Its an odd one, the turret and hull belong to two different machines, both of which were up-armored versions with the extra applique welded on. The engine bay is a mess, and the lower left rear 3 road-wheels and suspension is ruined. The turret itself was used as a training tool and so has a large cutaway side and all fitting removed (Ed Francis via Craig Moore)
