Last update : 18 July 2025

Listed here are the M4A1(76) VVSS Shermans that still exist today.

Iain Compton, January 2015 - <https://www.flickr.com/photos/requiel/16080384129/in/photolist-quYaYe-e8XrUG>

M4A1(76) Sherman – Kevin Wheatcroft Collection (UK) – running condition

Adam Pawley, April 2019

M4A1(76) Sherman – Bovington Tank Museum (UK)

The hull is probably an early one, we guess it has been produced in February, 1944. The turret is a later one with an oval loader's hatch, it probably replaced the original turret during remanufacture in the 1950s. It has MDAP fittings. The US Army got this tank from a German scrapyard at an unknown date, probably in the 1960s. It was a gate guard at the 1st US Armored Division, it was then part of exchange with 1st UK Armoured Division and was then exchanged with the Tank Museum for a Grizzly (Richard Stickland). It was displayed for some time at the Isle of Wight Military Museum

Pierre-Olivier Buan, June 2024

M4A1(76) Sherman – Private collection (UK)

Sequence number 5504, probably produced in October, 1944. Has MDAP fittings

M4A1(76) Sherman wrecks – Sunk off Malin Head, County Donegal (Ireland)

On September 8, 1944, the British 15,000-ton tanker/transport SS Empire Heritage while travelling as part of Convoy HXF 305 and carrying tanks and halftracks on her deck, was torpedoed and sunk by U-boat U-482 just off Malin Head, County Donegal, Ireland. The wreck today lies in about 70m (229 ft) of water and is of interest to scuba dives, with generally good visibility and being fairly accessible. In their watery grave like ghosts from the past, are a few of the still intact American M4 Sherman tanks that were tossed about from the deck of the SS Empire Heritage when she went down (<http://www.online-instagram.com/>)
